

Why mediate?

Through the mediation process, you can:

- Resolve issues quickly and cost effectively
- Ensure you have disclosed all items of property (as required by law when dividing relationship property) and that full disclosure has been provided to you
- Support your family and childcare arrangements
- Restore and maintain relationships
- Gain clarity and closure
- Learn skills for future conversations
- Maintain the confidentiality and privacy of your situation.

Disputes

When couples separate, there is always a lot to think about and work through including how relationship property will be divided.

Mediation is a collaborative way to reach an agreement on the division of relationship property in a timely manner. Mediation has many benefits and saves parties the time, stress and expense that inevitably results from drawn-out negotiations or Court processes.

The role of the mediator is to facilitate difficult conversations - to support and empower parties to reach agreement on the division of their relationship property.

Mediation

For relationship property agreements to be legally binding, separating couples need to have their own independent legal advice on any agreement reached at mediation. Parties may wish to have their lawyers attend mediation with them.

At Fair Way, we work closely with parties and their representatives to design a process based on individual needs while ensuring any agreement reached complies with the formalities of relationship property law.

All our relationship property mediators have expertise in Property (Relationships) Act 1976 so parties can trust they are in the right hands.

With Fair Way

Relationship property mediation with Fair Way has many benefits. We realise how complex the process of dividing relationship property can be.

Our team of Resolution Coordinators are available to guide you through the process, step by step.
